
Europeanization beyond Europe

Frank Schimmelfennig

ETH Zurich,
Center for Comparative and International Studies,
Seilergraben 49,
8092 Zürich, Switzerland
email: frank.schimmelfennig@eup.gess.ethz.ch

Accepted on 15 November 2009

Published on 17 December 2009

Abstract

This article reviews the literature on Europeanization beyond the group of EU member, “quasi-member” and applicant states. It uses the analysis of Europeanization in applicant states as a theoretical starting point to ask if, how and under which conditions we can expect domestic effects of European integration beyond Europe. Focusing on Europeanization effects in the areas of regionalism, democracy and human rights, and the literature on the European Neighborhood Policy in particular, the article collects findings on the strategies and instruments as well as the impact and effectiveness of the EU. The general conclusion to be drawn from the theoretical and empirical literature reviewed is one of low consistency and impact.

Keywords: democratization, Europeanization, Mediterranean, policy diffusion, security/external

Imprint / Terms of Use

Living Reviews in European Governance is a peer reviewed open access journal published by the European Community Studies Association Austria, at the Institute for European Integration Research, Austrian Academy of Sciences, Strohgasse 45/DG, 1030 Vienna, Austria. ISSN 1813-856X.

This review is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Non-Commercial-NoDerivs 3.0 Austria License: <http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-nd/3.0/at/>

Because a Living Reviews article can evolve over time, we recommend to cite the article as follows:

Frank Schimmelfennig, “Europeanization beyond Europe”, Living Reviews in European Governance, Vol. 4, (2009), No. 3: http://www.livingreviews.org/lreg-2009-3 (cited [<date>]).
--

The date given as <date> then uniquely identifies the version of the article you are referring to.

Article Revisions

Living Reviews in European Governance supports three different ways to keep its articles up-to-date:

Amendments are small editorial changes. These include, for example, the addition of fresh references or URLs. They are done under the responsibility of the Managing Editor. A summary of changes will be listed here.

Minor Updates are short addenda of current research results, trends and developments, or important publications that will be inserted at the appropriate place in the review text. They are refereed by the responsible subject editor and one external referee. A summary of changes will be listed here.

Major Revisions are changes, which involve substantial revision of article content, or the addition of new ideas that were not in the original text. They are subject to full external refereeing and are published with a new publication number.

For detailed documentation of an article's evolution, please refer always to the history document of the article's online version at <http://www.livingreviews.org/lreg-2009-3>.

17 December 2009: All Sections have been significantly extended and Table 1 was updated. A new Section 6 about the European Neighborhood policy and democracy promotion was implemented. The list of references has been updated and 35 references have been added.

Contents

1 Introduction 5

2 Theoretical perspectives 6

3 Goals and contents 9

4 Instruments and strategies 11

5 Impact and Effectiveness 13

 5.1 Regionalism 13

 5.2 Human rights and democracy 15

6 European Neighborhood Policy 17

 6.1 Democracy promotion in the ENP 18

 6.2 External governance beyond democracy promotion 19

7 Conclusions 20

8 Acknowledgements 21

References 22

List of Tables

1 Mechanisms of EU impact beyond the member-states 8

1 Introduction

At first, “Europeanization beyond Europe” seems an improbable candidate for a literature review. The skeptical reader may first ask: “Is there a literature on Europeanization beyond Europe?” The study of Europeanization is largely confined to the impact of European integration and governance on the member states of the European Union (EU) (see the Living Reviews by Goetz and Meyer-Sahling 2008; Ladrech 2009; Treib 2008). A few studies have expanded the scope of Europeanization analysis to the “quasi-member states,” specifically Norway and Switzerland (e.g. Fischer, Nicolet, and Sciarini 2002; Læg Reid, Steinthorsson, and Thorhallsson 2004; Mach, Häusermann, and Papadopoulos 2003; Sciarini, Fischer, and Nicolet 2004; Sverdrup and Kux 2000). Even more recently, the study of Europeanization has begun to include candidate states for EU membership (see the Living Review by Sedelmeier 2006). But is there any literature on “Europeanization beyond Europe”, that is, countries that are not eligible for membership in the foreseeable future? The editors of a recent compilation of Europeanization research admit, while positing that the scope of Europeanization is not conceptually limited to the impact of the EU on its member states, that their own handbook is no exception from this focus (Vink and Graziano 2007: 9, 12). None of its 25 chapters deal with Europeanization beyond accession countries. In addition, a title search in any major literature database combining the keyword “Europeanization” with the names of major countries or continents will yield few useful results, while those found are likely to be full of “noise” – articles and books that are actually about member and candidate states or those that use “Europeanization” in a very loose and metaphorical sense with few, if any, references to the Europeanization literature in political science studies of the EU.

Second and more fundamentally, the skeptical reader may argue that the available literature fails to mention “Europeanization” for a good reason and ask: “Is there Europeanization beyond Europe?” It is certainly plausible to assume that EU organizations, policies and decisions have a relevant domestic impact on member states, quasi-member states that participate in the internal market and the candidate states that must adopt the acquis communautaire to qualify for membership. But can the EU also have a systematic and distinctive influence of this kind beyond Europe?

This is a legitimate question that has triggered my interest for doing this review. What does the literature tell us about the EU’s goals and instruments in this area? What are the “mechanisms” of Europeanization beyond the group of actual and would-be members? To what extent and under which conditions has the EU been effective in Europeanizing countries beyond its membership region? A practical comparative starting point for answering these questions is found in the related field of Europeanization of candidate and accession countries (Sedelmeier 2006).

(1) In the case of quasi-members and candidate countries, it is clear that the transfer of the acquis communautaire is at the core of Europeanization. Participation in the highly regulated single market requires the adoption of its rules, and EU enlargement has always been based on the principle that new members must transpose the entire acquis, albeit with varying transition periods. Beyond the EU, the European Economic Area (EEA), and candidate countries, the content appears less predetermined. So what is the substance of Europeanization beyond Europe? Which ideas, norms, rules, organizational structures and procedures, behavioral patterns, etc., spread intentionally or unintentionally beyond integrated Europe?

(2) Whereas the EU uses the incentive of membership as the main – and generally effective – lever to make applicant countries adopt its rules, at least formally, this instrument is not applicable to countries currently ineligible for EU membership. Which other instruments and strategies does the EU then have at its disposal? And can these instruments and strategies be successful in the absence of the membership incentive and the accession conditionalities that often come with it?

(3) Finally, has the EU been able to transfer its rules and practices beyond the confines of its member and candidate countries? While there is no doubt that a massive transfer of EU rules and practices is taking place during the accession phase in countries aspiring to become EU members, it is far from obvious that countries outside the group of potential member states should be subject to Europeanization in a similarly pervasive way.

To be sure, there is growth in the amount of literature concerning EU external policies that are directed towards or likely to affect the domestic political systems, politics and policies of states beyond Europe. But “Europeanization” is rarely mentioned in this literature, let alone featured in the titles of books and articles. Rather, this literature examines the EU as an international or global actor or as a civilian or normative power; covers the EU’s foreign or external policy or policies; or discusses the EU’s relations with various regions of the world. In addition, this literature focuses on what the EU is in the international system (“actor”, “presence”, or “system”; “civilian”, “trade” or “normative power”, to name several favored concepts) and what it does in its external relations (policy decisions, content, instruments and strategies) rather than if and how it affects third countries. Moreover, to the extent that the literature does study the impact of the EU, it concentrates primarily on the impact of the EU on the international system (e.g. its influence on the balance of power) or on specific international regimes such as international climate or trade policy. What remains is a very small selection of literature studying the domestic impact of the EU beyond Europe – which is the core of the Europeanization research agenda. This review will therefore be based to a large extent on a second reading of this relevant portion of EU external relations literature, focusing on what we can learn from these works for the study of Europeanization.

As a consequence, this review cannot be based on seminal books or articles on “Europeanization beyond Europe” but needs to start from substantive questions and theoretical perspectives in order to locate and collect answers scattered across the literature. The main body of the review includes five parts: The first introduces theoretical perspectives for studying Europeanization beyond Europe. The subsequent parts follow the three questions arising from comparing Europeanization beyond Europe with Europeanization in the accession states: goals and contents; instruments and strategies; effectiveness and impact. Recently, the European Neighborhood Policy (ENP) has attracted more scholarly analysis, which will be the focus of a separate section. The ENP is a framework for all neighbors of the EU that do not have an explicit membership perspective. It comprises Moldova and Ukraine (and potentially Belarus, but not Russia) as well as the Northern African and Middle Eastern neighbors of the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership. The ENP can be seen as a most-likely case for Europeanization beyond Europe because it deals with close neighbors, covers a broad range of policies, and is based on the explicit commitment of the EU to extend its acquis beyond membership. In the final section, I draw a few general conclusions on the findings of the literature and the future research agenda.

This version of the review will focus on general principles of political order promoted by the EU (regionalism, democracy, and human rights) and on comparative analyses of Europeanization beyond Europe. Future updates and revisions of this review will include studies focusing on further specific regions and countries as well as specific EU policies.

2 Theoretical perspectives

In general, the study of Europeanization beyond Europe could benefit from the entire range of theoretical approaches that have been developed and put forward for analyzing Europeanization in the member states (for a brief overview, see Bulmer 2007). Here, however, I will limit myself to theoretical perspectives that have been used recently to analyze Europeanization beyond the borders of the EU – but mainly with regard to accession countries. All of them specify mechanisms of EU impact, and the conditions under which they operate and are effective, as building blocks for a theory of Europeanization.

(1) In their analysis of Europeanization in the accession countries of Central and Eastern Europe, Frank Schimmelfennig and Ulrich Sedelmeier (2004; 2005a) distinguish mechanisms of Europeanization according to two dimensions; On one hand, Europeanization can be EU-driven or domestically driven. On the other, it can be driven by institutional logics: the “logic of consequences” or the “logic of appropriateness” (March and Olsen 1989: 160–162). According to the logic of consequences, Europeanization can be driven by the EU through sanctions and rewards that alter the cost-benefit calculations of the target state (external incentives model). The impact of external incentives increases with the size of net benefits and the clarity and credibility of EU conditionality. According to the logic of appropriateness, Europeanization may be induced by social learning. Target states are persuaded to adopt EU rules if they consider these rules legitimate and identify with the EU. These mechanisms can be implemented either through intergovernmental interactions (bargaining or persuasion) or through transnational processes via societal actors within the target state (Schimmelfennig and Sedelmeier 2005a: 11–12, 18). Finally, according to the lesson-drawing model, states turn to the EU as a result of dissatisfaction with the domestic status quo and adopt EU rules if they perceive them as solutions to their problems, either based on instrumental calculations or the appropriateness of the EU solutions.

(2) In a study on the external dimension of Europeanization in the area of immigration policy, Sandra Lavenex and Emek Uçarer distinguish four modes of EU external governance differing in the extent to which intentional action of the EU or domestic interest of third countries triggers adaptation (Lavenex and Uçarer 2004: 420–421). “Unilateral policy emulation” occurs when third countries are convinced of the superiority of the EU’s rules and adopt them in order to more efficiently solve domestic problems. “Negative externalities” occurs if non-adaptation would create net costs. However, the presence of an EU requirement may produce policy transfer on the basis of opportune conditionality if the requirement meets the interests of the third country, or inopportune conditionality if adaptation is not in its interest but is compensated by other incentives.

(3) In their study of the impact of the EU on border conflicts, Thomas Diez, Stephan Stetter, and Mathias Albert (2006) construct a two-by-two table to conceptualize four “pathways of EU impact”. They distinguish pathways first according to “whether the impact is generated by concrete EU measures or an effect of integration processes that are not directly influenced by EU actors” (Diez, Stetter, and Albert 2006: 571). In addition, the impact can be on concrete policies or have wider social implications. The first pathway is “compulsory impact” – working with concrete measures, namely carrots and sticks, on concrete policies. The “connective impact” is established through concrete (mainly financial) measures establishing and supporting contact between conflicting parties. The other pathways function indirectly. According to the “enabling impact”, actors in conflict situations strengthen their influence by linking their political agendas and positions to the EU. Finally, the “constructive impact” results in a fundamental reconstruction of identities as a result of exposure to European integration (Diez, Stetter, and Albert 2006: 572–574).

(4) Michael Bauer, Christoph Knill, and Diana Pitschel (2007) use the trichotomy of EU governance modes in regulatory policy – compliance, competition and communication (Knill and Lenschow 2005) – to analyze domestic change in Central and Eastern Europe. Compliance is a coercive mechanism triggered by legally binding EU rules that national administrations must implement in order to avoid sanctions. Whereas compliance is linked to “positive integration”, i.e. the formal harmonization of national rules, competition is related to “negative integration”, i.e. the abolition of national barriers distorting the common market. In this mode of governance, the impact of the EU is less direct and works through market pressures rather than institutional sanctions. “Institutional change is thus stimulated by the need to improve the functional effectiveness of member states’ institutional arrangements in comparison to those of other participants within the common market.” (Bauer, Knill, and Pitschel 2007: 411) Finally, communication is defined as a governance mode that brings about change as a result of voluntary information exchange and mutual learning between national policy-makers in EU-sponsored networks. Rather than direct sanctions from the EU or indirect sanctions from the market, it is the legitimacy of policy models that drives Europeanization.

Obviously, there is considerable overlap between these conceptualizations. The classifications by Diez et al. and Bauer et al. also implicitly distinguish between logics of action; in contrast to Bauer et al., Diez et al., Lavenex and Uçarer as well as Schimmelfennig and Sedelmeier distinguish between direct EU-driven and indirect pathways of Europeanization. Finally, all classifications emphasize the ability of Europeanization to function through intergovernmental as well as transnational channels. Table 1 presents an attempt to map this conceptual overlap. It also shows the vacant fields in the three categorizations for which I suggest additional concepts.

Table 1: Mechanisms of EU impact beyond the member-states

	Intergovernmental		Transnational
	Direct	Indirect	Direct	Indirect
Logic of consequences	(1) Conditionality Intergovernmental incentives Compulsory impact Compliance	(2) Externalization Competition Negative externality	(3) Transnational incentives Connective impact	(4) Transnational externalization Competition
Logic of appropriateness	(5) Socialization Intergovernmental social learning Constructive impact Communication	(6) Imitation Lesson-drawing Enabling impact Unilateral emulation	(7) Transnational socialization Transnational social learning	(8) Societal imitation Enabling impact

Conditionality and socialization are the two fundamental mechanisms of EU impact that are compared and contrasted in most of the literature (see e.g. Coppieters et al. 2004; Kelley 2004; Kubicek 2003). Conditionality (1) is based on the direct, sanctioning impact of the EU on the target government and subsumes the intergovernmental channel of external incentives, the compulsory impact and the compliance mode of governance. In the conditionality mode the EU provides non-member governments with incentives such as financial aid, market access or institutional ties on the condition that they follow the EU's demands. By contrast, socialization (5) comprises all EU efforts to “teach” EU policies – as well as the ideas and norms behind them – to outsiders, to persuade outsiders that these policies are appropriate and, as a consequence, to motivate them to adopt EU policies. Socialization subsumes intergovernmental “social learning”, “constructive impact” and “communication”. All other mechanisms of EU impact are best seen as varieties of these two fundamental logics – varieties that work more indirectly and/or transnationally than conditionality and socialization.

Transnational incentives and socialization (3 and 7): The EU's conditionality and socialization can be directed at societal actors – parties, firms, interest groups, NGOs or even regional administrations – rather than central governments. In the “transnational incentive” or, according to Diez, Stetter, and Albert (2006), “connective” mode of governance, the EU provides these non-state actors with incentives to follow EU rules themselves and/or to put pressure on their governments to adopt EU rules. Likewise, in the “transnational socialization” mode of governance, the EU may try to persuade these societal actors of its values, norms, or policy ideas. Societal actors will then work to disseminate these ideas further domestically.

Externalization (2 and 4): Conditionality, transnational incentives and transnational socialization are similar in one respect – the EU seeks to directly induce non-member actors to adopt and follow its rules. There are also, however, indirect modes of EU external governance. In this view the EU is a “presence” (Allen and Smith 1990) rather than an actor in its external relations.

The EU's impact on third countries is a result of its capacity as an important system of regional governance and has an indirect (sometimes even unintended or unanticipated) effect on internal regulations and policies. According to the logic of consequences, internal EU governance may produce negative externalities towards third country governments and societal actors. External actors adopt and comply with EU rules because ignoring or violating them would generate net costs. This “governance by externalization” is most noticeably produced by the EU's internal market and competition policies; firms interested in participating in the EU market must follow the EU's rules. This is similar to the competition mode of governance described by Bauer, Knill, and Pitschel \(2007\) and “negative externalities” (Lavenex and Uçarer 2004). It may affect societal actors, such as firms and business associations, as well as governments that are induced to alter their own rules and policies in line with those of the EU.

Imitation (6 and 8): The EU's processes and policies may provide a model for other regions, states and societal actors. Here, the logic of appropriateness is at work. Non-member actors imitate the EU because they recognize EU rules and policies as appropriate solutions to their own problems. This is in line with “lesson-drawing” (Schimmelfennig and Sedelmeier 2005a) or “deliberate emulation” (Lavenex and Uçarer 2004) by governments as well as non-state actors, and also resembles the “enabling impact” of the EU, which describes the use of EU policies and solutions by governmental and societal actors to add external legitimacy to their own political agenda (Diez, Stetter, and Albert 2006: 573).

I suggest that these mechanisms could also be effectively used to theorize “Europeanization beyond the EU”. The question then remains, under which conditions these mechanisms operate and are effective beyond the EU's member and candidate states. None of the studies reviewed above generate high expectations of impact in this regard. According to the analyses in Schimmelfennig and Sedelmeier \(2005b\), the EU's impact in candidate countries has resulted primarily from the external incentives of accession conditionality rather than social learning or lesson-drawing. Democratic conditionality ahead of accession negotiations has worked best when countries had a credible promise of eventual membership and when the domestic power costs of adopting democratic and human rights norms were low, i.e. did not threaten regime survival. Acquis conditionality regarding specific EU rules began to have a major effect only after accession negotiations commenced.

Diez, Stetter, and Albert \(2006\) find that the “transformative power of integration” in border conflicts is strongest when all parties to the conflict are EU members; much weaker when parties are only associated with the EU; and even negative when the external border of the EU coincides with the contested border. According to Diez, Stetter, and Albert this is not only because of conditionality. Membership, and association to a lesser extent, also increases the legitimacy of EU positions (enabling impact), support for common activities (connective impact) and exposure to the constructive impact (Diez, Stetter, and Albert 2006: 573–574, 588).

Finally, Bauer, Knill, and Pitschel \(2007\) also generally expect the potential impact of the EU to be higher in states with strong prospects for membership than in “unlikely members”. Again, this not only applies to the governance mode of compliance (conditionality). Whereas the compliance mode is expected to have no effect in non-candidate countries, both competition and communication are hypothesized to have at least a limited effect in the long term due to the fact that non-candidate countries are subject to market pressures generated by the EU and participate in EU-sponsored policy networks.

3 Goals and contents

What is the substantive content of Europeanization beyond Europe? What kind of intentional or unintentional domestic impact does the EU have on third countries? In general, Europeanization covers a broad range of political impacts across the triad of polity, politics and policy.

Perhaps the most accessible general characterization of the literature of Europeanization beyond Europe follows the thesis of “domestic analogy”. According to this thesis polities prefer to have an international environment that is ordered according to their own principles and procedures. The substantive goals – as well as instruments – thus mirror the fundamental principles of the EU and European integration (Peters and Wagner 2005: 215–216); Europeanization consists of “the external projection of internal solutions” (Lavenex 2004: 695).

This general characterization entails various, more specific claims regarding the goals that the EU pursues globally.

First, the EU promotes its model of regionalism to other regions. It proposes regional economic and market integration and the establishment of supranational organizations as pathways to peace and welfare in other parts of the world (Bicchi 2006; Farrell 2007). The regionalist model is also evident in the tendency of the EU to design its policies for, and conclude agreements with, regional groupings of countries rather than with individual states.

Second, and perhaps in a more critical perspective, the EU is often known to propagate a “neoliberal” economic model, which reflects the EU’s internal commitment to market-building and economic liberalization (see, e.g., Hurt 2003, 2004). Others point out, however, that the EU does not stand for free-market policies as such but for a multilaterally managed “regulatory framework for liberal markets” according to its own model (Grugel 2004: 616; Woolcock 2005: 396).

Third, the EU promotes constitutional norms such as human rights, the rule of law and democracy in its external relations (e.g. Manners 2002: 240–241). Mirroring the debate surrounding the economic model advocated by the EU, Gordon Crawford asserts that, in this case, the EU promotes a rather limited democracy assistance agenda “oriented at challenging state power and sustaining economic liberalisation rather than extending popular participation and control”, and thus “consistent with the maintenance of neo-liberal hegemony” (Crawford 2005: 594, 596).

In sum, the EU as a regionally integrated system of liberal democracies, regionalism, regulated transnational markets and democratic constitutionalism define the essence of being “European”. “Europeanization” then includes promoting regionally integrated liberal democracies beyond its borders. From a rational perspective, an international environment that mirrors the EU is likely to be in the best interest of the EU and its member states. It is an environment that they are familiar with – and know to use to their benefit. This reduces adaptation and information costs and gives them an advantage over non-EU actors that are less familiar with such an environment (Peters and Wagner 2005: 216). Others, however, emphasize shared values and norms as well as established routines and templates of the EU as the source of these goals. Federica Bicchi, for instance, suggests that EU external policy can “be seen as unreflexive behaviour mirroring the deeply engrained belief that Europe’s history is a lesson for everybody. Put briefly, [it] is informed, at least partially, by the idea that ‘our size fits all’” (Bicchi 2006: 287). Regional economic integration and liberal democracy thus represent strong beliefs and universally valid ideas of an effective political order that are promoted regardless of calculations of benefit and feasibility.

The focus on more general principles of political order in “Europeanization beyond Europe” may be an artifact of the literature that has indicated a strong interest in the normative content of EU external policies and the EU as a value-driven actor and “normative power” (e.g. Manners 2002; Lucarelli and Manners 2006; Sjørnsen 2006a,b). It also, however, reflects the EU’s official external relations doctrine. In addition, it is in line with the findings on Europeanization in candidate countries (Schimmelfennig and Sedelmeier 2005b): Prior to the accession process proper, the focus on and impact of the EU’s specific acquis rules has been generally weak. Rather, the EU’s constitutive political norms are prominent.

Yet the focus on regional integration and liberal democracy also raises questions. First of all, what is understood as distinctly “European” in “Europeanization”? Whereas it may be granted that regionalism is a unique feature of EU external relations, democracy, human rights and market economy are Western principles propagated by non-EU Western countries (such as the United States) and other international organizations (e.g. the Council of Europe or the OECD) as well. Moreover, the EU itself may have been influenced by broader tendencies and patterns in the international system. Take, for instance, the “neoliberal” economic order the EU advocates in its external relations. In this case the EU is not only part of a larger tendency represented by most other international economic organizations (Hurt 2004); its own internal economic governance has changed under the impact of “neoliberalism” as well. By the same token researchers must be extremely careful in attributing liberal democratic domestic change in third countries to “Europeanization”. The general problem of Europeanization research – that EU influences must be analytically separated from international non-EU and domestic societal and political influences – is more difficult the less EU-specific the rules in question and the less dense the institutional relationship between the EU and a third country are.

Second, the arguments concerning the “domestic analogy” (Peters and Wagner 2005) or the “ontological quality” of the EU as a “changer of norms” (Manners 2002: 252) clearly fail to sufficiently take into account the evolution and changes of the EU’s “Europeanization” goals and strategies over time. Both arguments suggest that, having been a regional organization of liberal democratic countries from its very beginnings, the EU should also have engaged in promoting its model from the start. Yet the promotion of regionalism, economic liberalism, human rights and democracy has only become prominent since the early 1990s (see below). Instead, the global political changes of the time (the end of the Cold War, the wave of democratization) and the concomitant institutional enhancement of the EU as an international actor (the Common Foreign Security Policy (CFSP) established in the Maastricht Treaty) seem to have spurred the explicit definition and promotion of the EU model beyond Europe (Farrell 2007: 304).

Third, the focus on “nice” and general goals that are officially propagated and intentionally pursued by the EU may come at the expense of studying more policy-specific, unintended or even “nasty” domestic consequences of the EU’s presence in the world. As an effect of the EU’s market power, for instance, producers and legislators in third countries will often be forced to unilaterally adopt EU product standards. Consequently, we can observe policy- or issue-specific Europeanization. Moreover, the effects of the protectionist Common Agricultural Policy on the welfare and societal and political development of less developed countries have arguably been extensive.

Finally, the focus in the literature on general political principles and constitutional goals should not obscure the fact that the EU is predominantly a system of issue-specific, technical international rules applied to a great variety of policy areas that make up its acquis communautaire (Magen 2007: 364–366). To a large extent, the EU propagates these rules directly in order to influence the agenda and decision-making of international organizations and the policy-making and legislative activities of third countries. In addition, however, the sheer weight of the EU market induces third countries to adapt to or adopt EU rules in order to be able to participate in it.

In the remainder of the review I will focus largely on the general political principles pro-actively advocated and pursued by the EU. In the subsequent section the focus will be placed on how these principles have been pursued. Which instruments, strategies and mechanisms does the literature identify?

4 Instruments and strategies

The literature is in broad agreement that the 1990s have witnessed a major change in EU external policies: the establishment of conditionality, in particular political conditionality, as a core instrument. Before the 1990s EU external relations had been notable for their apolitical content and the principle of not interfering with the domestic systems of third countries. Since the beginning of the 1990s, however, democracy, human rights and the rule of law have become “essential elements” in almost all EU agreements with third countries as both an objective and a condition of the institutionalized relationship. In case of violation, the EU may suspend or terminate the agreement (Hornig 2003). These goals were complemented later by “good governance”.

How did this policy change come about? It would be insufficient to simply attribute political conditionality via domestic analogy to the constitutional values and norms of the EU, which had existed before and did not change at the beginning of the 1990s. Outside the EU the changed external political environment following the wave of democratization in 1989/90 was the major influence. The wave of democratization not only strengthened the international legitimacy of liberal democracy but also increased the need to support new and fledgling democracies. This was complemented by the increasing acceptance in development policy circles that economic aid and conditionality were insufficient in the absence of political reform and good governance. Inside the EU the European Parliament was the major driving force. It could use the assent procedure for treaties with third countries, which had been introduced by the Single European Act (SEA), to press for political conditionality (Holland 2002: 120; Smith 2001).

EU conditionality is generally described as “positive”. It uses “carrots” rather than “sticks” – rewards rather than punishment or assistance (Holland 2002: 132; Schimmelfennig 2005; Smith 2001; Youngs 2001a: 192). In spite of the “essential elements” clause, no agreements with third countries have been suspended or terminated. According to Youngs, “in practice European policy was in no significant way based on the use of coercive measures”; the EU has shown “no notable propensity to impose punitive action directly in relation to democratic shortfalls”. “European policy-makers saw a more positive, incentives-based form of conditionality as more legitimate and potentially more effective” than the use of sticks (Youngs 2001a: 192). Below the level of treaty relationships, however, the EU has, in fact, used the “stick”. In several cases financial aid was withheld, reduced or suspended, and negotiations were delayed (e.g. Nwobike 2005). However, “there is scant evidence of additional assistance to countries where things are improving” (Smith 2001: 190).

Conditionality is not the only mechanism of Europeanization observed – even in the field of democracy and human rights promotion. In his study of EU democracy promotion in the Mediterranean and East Asia, Richard Youngs finds evidence of two rather different strategies: civil society support and socialization. In addition, he observes that the “profile of EU democracy assistance funding in the two regions suggested a bottom-up approach, oriented overwhelmingly to civil society support, and in particular human rights NGOs” (Youngs 2001a: 192; Youngs 2001b: 362). This is also true for Latin America where the EU has little leverage for using political conditionality and has sought to develop direct links with civil society actors (Grugel 2004: 612).

On the other hand Youngs claims that “in light of the limits to positive and negative material measures, EU strategy was characterized by an aim to develop deeply institutionalized patterns of dialogue and co-operation as means of socializing political elites into a positive and consensual adherence to democratic norms” (Youngs 2001a: 193). The EU used “generally accepted cooperation over technical governance issues” in order to indirectly promote good governance and democracy (Youngs 2001a: 195; 2001b: 363). According to Youngs the socialization approach is designed to create opportunities for “imitation and demonstration effects” and starts with very modest expectations of introducing the vocabulary of democracy into domestic discourse and inducing elites to, at the very least, publicly support democracy (Youngs 2001b: 359). It is these strategies, rather than political conditionality, that bear evidence of a distinctive and innovative “European approach” to democracy promotion and have been “unduly overlooked” (Youngs 2001a: 192, 195). By contrast, the US approach to democracy promotion has been characterized by more “concrete intervention” and a “more top-down, politicized . . . assistance” focusing on the “formal procedural elements of democracy” (Youngs 2001b: 360, 363–364).

In sum, the Europeanization strategies identified by Youngs in the area of human rights and democracy competition match the most important mechanisms identified in the theoretical literature (see section 2 above): conditionality, (intergovernmental) socialization, and direct EU-society links (via transnational socialization and domestic empowerment). The next question is whether the literature on Europeanization beyond Europe also confirms expectations of weak impact.

5 Impact and Effectiveness

What impact has EU external governance had beyond member and candidate states? How and to what extent has the EU been able to Europeanize non-European countries and regions? In reviewing the literature I will again focus on regionalism and democracy/human rights. The two criteria for evaluating EU policy most frequently found in the literature are consistency and effectiveness.

5.1 Regionalism

According to Federica Bicchì the EU has consistently promoted regionalism and followed a regional approach in its agreements and relations with non-European third countries around the world – with the exception of EU-US bilateral relations (Bicchì 2006: 287–288). This rather consistent approach across time and space and in spite of regional divergences strongly indicates that the EU follows an organizational norm rather than functional considerations. This is particularly evident with regard to regional policies addressing “regions” that have few objective regional characteristics (such as high density of transactions) and do not perceive themselves as regional communities – such as the “Mediterranean” or the African, Caribbean, and Pacific (ACP) countries. Rather, they constitute “regions” mainly according to EU policy (Bicchì 2006: 288).

As Jean Grugel argues in a comparative analysis of EU and US policy vis-à-vis Latin America, this regionalism is also distinctively European. First, relations are discursively constructed as “inter-regional partnerships”, “based around notions of equity and cooperation that ignores or transcends the underlying power inequalities” (Grugel 2004: 607–608). Second, the EU “has developed a conscious political leg to its new regionalism”, distinct from US-sponsored free-trade associations, built around “the promotion of its own model of democracy, social welfare, and regional integration”, understood as subregional integration within Latin America (Grugel 2004: 616).

If the EU’s promotion of regionalism has been consistent and distinctive, has it been isomorphic as well? That is, have regional arrangements created and supported by the EU been modeled on the EU example and have they been similar to each other? The great variety of interregional cooperation arrangements seems to contradict the expectation of isomorphism (for an overview, see Alecu de Flers and Regelsberger 2005). In addition, there appears to be disagreement as far as the assessment of specific arrangements is concerned. For instance, whereas Bicchì argues that the institutional settings and governance regimes of the EU and its Mediterranean policy (EMP) are highly similar to international governance with regard to its multilateral institutional framework, the emphasis on “economic matters but with a social flavour”, and the “eurocentric” transfer of the Justice and Home Affairs agenda to the EMP (Bicchì 2006: 295–298), Joffé (2001) and Alecu de Flers and Regelsberger (2005: 323) point to the fact that the Barcelona process has been modeled on the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) rather than the EU.

The region that the EU seems to regard as most promising with regard to isomorphic regionalism is Latin America, particularly its Southern Cone, which is culturally the most similar world region and has also implemented a common market project (Mercosur) that might develop along European lines (Grugel 2004: 616). Here, the EU seeks to spread its ideas of regional integration and good governance through “research funding, seminar programmes, and the creation of a fund to provide for the regular exchange of ideas within Latin America, in imitation of its own policies” (Grugel 2004: 612).

Interestingly, however, it is the African Union (AU – designed in 2000) that mirrors the EU most closely in institutional terms, with its Parliament, Commission, Executive Council of Ministers, Court of Justice and plans for a common currency. The use of the EU template in this case seems to have been a case of lesson-drawing or imitation rather than EU conditionality or socialization. However, the apparent supranational set-up of the AU is not matched by supranational competences for these institutions (Farrell 2007: 312).

Unintended effects of the EU's presence – rather than effects of intentional promotion of regionalism – seem to have occurred in other regions and sub-regions as well. Christopher Hill and Michael Smith point out that “the need to deal with a rich and powerful EU draws other states into cooperative ventures, especially in their international relations” (Hill and Smith 2005: 396, their italics) and list the South African Development Committee as well as the Asia-Europe Meeting (ASEM) as examples. Although the EU might have unintentionally triggered regional cooperation in these cases, the cooperation schemes did not follow the EU model of regionalism.

Both Thomas Christiansen, Petto, and Tonra (2000) and Anne Myrjord (2003) refer to the ambivalent effects of the EU on regional institutions and region-building in adjacent regions. EU neighborhood policies have reduced the divisive effects of enlargement and “minimized the importance of the institutional boundary between the Union and its environment” (Myrjord 2003: 251). They represent “a turn towards an inclusive form of conducting EU external policy” and give non-member countries a say in EU policy-making (Myrjord 2003: 251; see also Christiansen, Petto, and Tonra 2000: 412). However, the often bilateral framework of negotiations between the EU and third states tends to undermine the model of multilateral regional integration that the EU seeks to promote, and external governance arrangements can only partially offset the disruptive effects of the EU's differentiation between members, candidates and non-candidates in neighboring regions (Christiansen, Petto, and Tonra 2000: 407, 412). These findings are supported in the study by Diez, Stetter, and Albert (2006), which claims that EU borders that adjoin existing border conflicts exacerbate rather than mitigate these conflicts.

In addition, “an emerging dependence on relatively strong EU financial instruments carries the potential of crowding out existing regional initiatives” (Myrjord 2003: 252). This effect will, of course, depend on the existence and strength of endogenous region-building developments. Whereas the EU may have had an overall disruptive effect in the Baltic and Nordic regions, where such region-building efforts seem to have been relatively well developed, “even the limited efforts of the EU to generate multilateralism constitute the main driving force in an externally directed region-building effort” (Christiansen, Petto, and Tonra 2000: 412) in the Mediterranean.

With regard to Africa, Hurt is equally skeptical: “The history of regional integration projects within the ACP group, especially in Africa, is one of consistent failure to achieve meaningful integration and development.” Moreover, the six new regions defined in the Cotonou Agreement¹ of 2002 are “externally imposed and do not in most cases correspond to existing regional organizations” (Hurt 2003: 173).

In sum, the promotion of regionalism has indeed been a consistent and distinctive feature of EU external relations. The presence of the EU, its success in regional integration and its importance as an economic actor have served as models and triggered regional cooperation schemes in other parts of the world. Both conditionality and lesson-drawing/imitation seem to have been at work in these processes. Yet the scope and design of these schemes are extremely diverse and bear, at best, superficial resemblance to the EU. In addition, the actual policy of the EU toward and in these regional arrangements seems at times to undermine rather than strengthen regionalism beyond the EU.

¹ The Cotonou Agreement replaced the Lomé Convention as the general treaty framework between the EU and the group of African, Caribbean, and Pacific states. Its focus is on development policy.

5.2 Human rights and democracy

Just as Bicchi \(2006\) in the case of regionalism, Tanja Börzel and Thomas Risse argue that “the instruments used by the EU to promote democracy, human rights, the rule of law, and ‘good governance’ look surprisingly similar across the globe”, indicating that “the EU follows quite clearly a specific cultural script” (Börzel and Risse 2004: 2). The use of political conditionality, political dialogue and capacity-building mechanisms in all world regions demonstrate movement “towards a coherent approach”, which did not follow a grand design but “incremental ‘learning by doing’” (Börzel and Risse 2004: 28–29). However, Börzel and Risse avowedly fail to analyze the implementation of the EU’s approach, as well as its effectiveness on the ground. The picture of consistency quickly becomes blurred when this is taken into account.

The consistency of EU political conditionality is a central issue addressed in the literature, and the general conclusion is that it is “not consistent”. Inconsistency starts with the fact that “essential-elements” clauses are not included in agreements with China and the ASEAN countries, nor with Australia, Canada, and New Zealand. While this may be attributed to the presence of a stable democracy in the latter cases, this justification clearly does not apply to the Asian countries.

Authors generally recognize that the EU treats countries differently regardless of similarities in human rights records. Despite the pervasive political and legal rhetoric of democracy and human rights promotion, actual policy seems to match rhetoric only when consistency is “cheap”; otherwise, it is driven by a host of other geopolitical, economic or security interests. According to Karen Smith, “poor, marginal states (often in Africa) of little importance to the EU or one of its member states tend to be subjected to negative conditionality; these are the cases where it is easiest to show that you are doing something about human rights” (Smith 2001: 193). In other cases member states block suspension or termination because this would harm commercial interests, because the country is strategically or politically too important or because they have doubts about the effectiveness of negative measures (Smith 2001: 196).

Overriding interest in cooperation on energy issues and the war on terror is also cited as the main reason why democracy promotion was not prioritized in Central Asia, despite the dismal political record of the region (Warkotsch 2006). In a comparative analysis of EU responses to violations of democratic norms in the post-Soviet area, Alexander Warkotsch further shows that, while the existence of a democracy clause in EU-third country agreements significantly increases the likelihood of an EU response to anti-democratic policies, it is not significantly correlated with responses that go beyond verbal denunciation. By contrast, stronger sanctions are more likely to be used against geographically proximate states and less likely against resource-rich countries (Warkotsch 2008).

Martin Holland reports that suspensions have mainly hit participants in the Lomé Convention and countries that were economically relatively unimportant to the EU; on the other hand, the EU spared Asian and economically more relevant countries (Holland 2002: 133). In conclusion he argues that while the “link between development and democratic principles of good government has become the accepted and inevitable face of North-South relations; the degree to which this conditionality is supervised and sanctioned remains variable, almost idiosyncratic” (Holland 2002: 135).

Richard Youngs also generally finds that the “the overall distribution of EU trade and aid provisions did not to any significant extent correlate with democratic criteria” and punishment as well as rewards “were adopted on an ad hoc basis and not pursued with any coherence or vigour” (Youngs 2001b: 357). He also observes that the EU has reacted more to massive human rights abuses and “dramatic interruptions of the democratic process” than to persistently autocratic governments. “Democratic conditionality has not been systematic.” (Youngs 2001b: 356)

In a statistical analysis of the suspension of development cooperation in reaction to human rights violations, Hadewych Hazelzet comes to more nuanced results. She finds that “the level of respect for human rights or regime type was not significant for the granting of EU development cooperation” and that the EU was less likely “to impose sanctions on countries with which it has institutionalised cooperation”, which confirm the general picture of inconsistency (Hazelzet 2005: 9–10). But she also finds that former French and British colonies were sanctioned less severely than former colonies of other EU member states, indicating the protective influence of France and Britain (Hazelzet 2005: 10). On the whole, however, her multivariate regression analysis “indicates that, in the 1990s, overall the level of human rights violations was a more important determinant for EU sanctions than the level of economic or strategic importance of a country” (Hazelzet 2005: 11). In the end, Hazelzet’s findings refer only to ACP countries. As other authors have pointed out (see above), this group of countries was of relatively minor economic and strategic importance to the EU and was thus more likely to be treated consistently than Asian countries.

This inconsistency differs markedly from the fairly consistent and meritocratic use of political conditionality vis-à-vis the accession countries (see, e.g., Schimmelfennig 2003: 99–108; Vachudová 2005). The variation in institutional set-up may be one cause for this discrepancy. In the accession cases political assessments and decisions are prepared by the Commission in a centralized manner; beyond applicant countries, governments of member state and the various pillars of the EU are more strongly involved (Smith 2001; Youngs 2001a: 28–46). Alternatively, the difference can be explained by a “community effect: when constitutional questions such as membership are at stake, the pressure to act in line with the constitutive community rules increases. Rule adoption is expedient for outside cooperation partners but indispensable for future members. Whereas interest-based considerations are permitted to take the upper hand in relations with external states, the constitutive community rules will prevail in relations with future insiders” (Schimmelfennig, Engert, and Knobel 2006: 46).

Beyond Europe, the move toward intergovernmental political conditionality seems thus to have been a declaratory rather than practical policy. If the EU’s political conditionality approach has been inconsistent in countries and regions beyond Europe, what about its policies of domestic empowerment and socialization? According to Richard Youngs the EU did not pursue these strategies consistently either. As to civil society assistance, “the EU did not push hard to gain access for political aid work” and was “unwilling to risk tension with recipient governments”. In its dialogue and cooperation “the EU often deliberately sought ways of circumventing its own formal preconditions, offering concrete sectoral cooperation without the need for a formalization of new democracy-based discourse” (Youngs 2001a: 193; see also Youngs 2001b: 365). It seems thus to be a general feature of EU democracy promotion that it has been, as several authors have put it, “high on rhetoric and low on policy” (Crawford 2005 on Ghana; Warkotsch 2006 on Central Asia).

Elsewhere, Richard Youngs (2004) uses the case of EU human rights promotion in order to make a general point about the interaction of norms and strategic interests in EU external relations. He argues that “instrumental choices are made within a range of common normative understandings” and, in particular, that “security-driven choices [have] been selected within the overarching human rights framework” (Youngs 2004: 431). In his analysis EU human rights policy has been attuned to the general promotion of international stability and exhibited a “state-oriented capacity-building bias” (Youngs 2004: 424).

There is broad agreement in the literature not only on the overall inconsistency of EU strategy, but also on the overall low impact of the EU on democracy and human rights in non-candidate third countries. These findings hold regardless of the region under study and strategy used. The causes of ineffectiveness appear rather overdetermined for political conditionality. First, vis-à-vis non-candidate countries, the EU cannot use its most important incentive for compliance – the prospect of membership. Second, inconsistency hampers effectiveness: the “seemingly variable application of conditionality ... detracts from the EU’s international credibility and influence” (Holland 2002: 135). Third, for the predominantly authoritarian or autocratic governments in the EU’s neighboring regions, compliance with the EU’s democratic or human rights standards is politically costly. It involves the risks of losing political power that, in the perception of third-country governments, are not offset by the economic or diplomatic rewards the EU has on offer. The indirect strategies were confronted with the same obstacle when the ruling elites in target states “perceived that the good governance agenda was elaborated with increasingly political intent” (Youngs 2001a: 195; see also Tanner 2004: 140–141).

To conclude, EU democracy promotion and human rights policy beyond Europe has used the three mechanisms of conditionality, socialization and domestic empowerment. In all of these cases, however, EU policy in third countries and regions has been characterized by low consistency and effectiveness. In the next section I will review the more recent and specialized literature on the European Neighborhood Policy in order to find if the general findings hold true there as well.

6 European Neighborhood Policy

The European Neighborhood Policy (ENP) was introduced by the EU during the time of its “big bang” enlargement of 2004 in order to expand and strengthen its relationship with neighboring countries that would not be considered as candidates for membership – at least for the foreseeable future. Originally conceived to encompass the enlarged EU’s Eastern European neighbors, it was later extended to the Middle Eastern and North African partner countries of the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership (“Barcelona Process”) and further to the Caucasus. It excludes Russia, however, which insisted on pursuing a separate track of cooperation with the EU (see e.g. Johansson-Nogués 2007 for an overview of the history of ENP).

The ENP can easily be seen as a framework of Europeanization. It was designed by Commission officials who had previously been in charge of enlargement and applied previously acquired tools to their new positions (Kelley 2006). It was originally planned to mirror the EEA by extending the EU market and acquis in the absence of formal membership in EU organizations. In addition, three principles of enlargement policy appeared in the ENP documents: First, the ENP is based on the EU’s commitment to promote core liberal values and norms beyond its borders and, second, it claims to use political conditionality as the main instrument of norm promotion. “Differentiation” is a fundamental principle of the ENP. In the absence of the membership incentive, the ENP strategy documents tie both participation in the ENP as such and the intensity and level of cooperation to the ENP partners’ adherence to liberal values and norms (Maier and Schimmelfennig 2007: 40–42). Third, the EU uses planning, reporting and assistance procedures similar to that used for candidate countries (Baracani 2009: 136–137).

There are clear differences to enlargement, however, beyond the obvious fact that the ENP is not designed to guide third countries toward membership. For one, the major incentives designed to induce Europeanization in ENP countries – a liberalized access of goods and persons to the EU – is likely to be undermined by protectionist interest groups in the EU, the exclusion of sectors such as agriculture in which the ENP partners have a competitive edge and fears of crime and uncontrolled immigration in the EU (Occhipinti 2007; Sedelmeier 2007: 201–205; Vachudová 2007).

Second, rather than full transposition of the acquis, the EU’s “expectation is for partial and progressive alignment with EU legal norms in areas where it makes economic sense, suits the development level and serves the development goals of the neighbours” (Noutcheva and Emerson 2007: 91). Moreover, the EU “puts a much stronger emphasis on ‘soft’ and participatory mechanisms involving the ENP partners” (Sedelmeier 2007: 199). Rather than unilaterally imposed by the EU based on its acquis, the Action Plans at the core of ENP programming are negotiated and monitored between the EU and its partners bilaterally and based on “joint ownership”.

Joint ownership, a core principle of the socialization mechanism of Europeanization, is considered by many to undermine the effectiveness of conditionality. On one hand, “it reduces the likelihood that bilateral Action Plans reflect the EU’s objective precisely in relations with those countries which are furthest from conforming to the conditions preferred by the EU” (Sedelmeier 2007: 200). Governments that do not share the EU’s democracy and human rights agenda, for instance, can and do minimize the role of political conditionality in their Action Plans. On the other, it is “at odds with the tough monitoring and reporting by EU institutions that was a precondition for reform-oriented forces to mobilize pressure against reform-adverse governments in East Central European accession governments” (ibid.). To summarize, Ulrich Sedelmeier expects the coexistence of conditionality and socialization in the ENP to “undermine their respective potential” (Sedelmeier 2007: 201).

By contrast, Gwendolyn Sasse finds merit and opportunities in the ENP’s “conditionality-lite” (Sasse 2008). While she agrees that it is unlikely to produce short-term EU-driven change at the level of third country governments, ENP conditionality may serve as an external reference point for longer-term domestic political processes. In her view the vagueness of conditions and incentives “makes it easier for traditionally Euro-sceptic actors in ENP countries to approach the EU gradually and selectively” (Sasse 2008: 298).

6.1 Democracy promotion in the ENP

The expectation of (at least short-term) ineffectiveness is borne out by the preliminary evidence published so far. An analysis of ENP participants’ democracy and human rights records since they established contractual relations with the EU in the mid-1990s shows that the EU has neither consistently linked its cooperation agreements with the political situation in these countries, nor have these countries liberalized as a result of EU political conditionality (Maier and Schimmelfennig 2007: 45–48). Comparisons of ENP Action Plans confirm the absence of a coherent democracy promotion policy and the overriding importance of the EU’s geostrategic and partner countries’ political interests (Bosse 2007; Baracani 2009).

Studies of EU democracy promotion in the Mediterranean confirm this overall assessment. The EU’s consistent application of political conditionality in this region is undermined by its efforts to build a multilateral partnership in the Southern Mediterranean and to promote peace in the Middle East – otherwise it would risk losing essential partners for these efforts. At the end of the day, the EU, and particularly its southern member states, prefer stable, authoritarian and Western-oriented regimes to the instability and Islamist electoral victories that genuine democratization processes in this region are likely to produce (Gillespie and Whitehead 2002: 196; Gillespie and Youngs 2002: 12–13; Youngs 2002: 42; Jünemann 2003: 7).

The EU’s socialization efforts are limited by the same security and stability concerns. Though EU democracy assistance has been institutionally and financially strengthened, it has remained modest in scale. In addition, it has been primarily directed towards secular civil society organizations engaged in non-political services that are approved by, and often connected to, partner governments (Gillespie and Whitehead 2002: 197; Haddadi 2002, 2003; Jünemann 2002; Youngs 2002: 55–57). These assessments stem from the pre-ENP period but have been confirmed by more recent studies (Pace 2009; Pace, Seeberg, and Cavatorta 2009: 4–5; Youngs 2008).

Given the limits and failures of top-down political conditionality and bottom-up socialization in the context of the ENP, Sandra Lavenex, Frank Schimmelfennig and their collaborators have begun to examine an alternative model of democracy promotion in the European Neighborhood. The “democratic governance” model starts with the assumption that the intensifying web of association relations between the EU and associated third countries introduces a new form of democracy promotion through sectoral cooperation. Democratic governance goes beyond “good governance” in that it includes general attributes of democracy such as horizontal and vertical accountability, transparency and stakeholder and general participation. It differs from the direct promotion of democracy in that it does not target the general institutions and processes of the polity, such as elections, parties, or parliaments, but operates at the level of sectoral policy-making. The EU seeks not only to externalize its material acquis rules for regulating public policy in each sector of political cooperation between the EU and its neighboring countries, but also procedural rules on how sectoral policies and actors are made transparent, accountable and participatory. Though democratic governance promotion initially remains at the sectoral level and – in the case of success – leads to the democratization of sectoral governance, it may spill over into the general polity by inculcating democratic values, norms and habits on societal and bureaucratic actors and creating a demand for far-reaching democratization of the entire political system (Freyburg, Skripka, and Wetzel 2007; Freyburg et al. 2009a).

In an empirical assessment comparing democratic governance promotion in three sectors (asylum, competition and environmental policy) and countries (Moldova, Morocco, and Ukraine), they show that the EU is, indeed, capable of inducing neighbouring countries to incorporate policy-specific democratic governance provisions into domestic legislation in the absence of accession conditionality. This is especially the case when the corresponding EU rules are strongly legalized and are linked to overarching international norms. The study also shows, however, that the application of these provisions in administrative practice has remained weak thus far (Freyburg et al. 2009b).

6.2 External governance beyond democracy promotion

Democracy promotion is the most widely studied area of Europeanization in the European Neighborhood. Studies focusing on other EU rules and policies remain relatively scarce. As in democracy promotion, the available evidence points to systematic weaknesses in EU impact. At a general level, Gergana Noutcheva and Michael Emerson show on the basis of World Bank governance scores that “most of them have regressed rather than progressed on both regulatory quality and rule of law” between 1996 and 2004 (Noutcheva and Emerson 2007: 90), i.e. during the time that the EU established institutionalized and – at least on paper – politically conditioned relations with the neighborhood countries.

In his book on EU external energy policy Stephan Hofer compares EU rule export in Bulgaria, Serbia and Ukraine (Hofer 2008). His general argument combines the imitation and conditionality mechanisms. For one, successful EU rule transfer requires that there be an economic necessity for reform in the country. In addition, however, the EU needs to apply proactive accession conditionality in order to overcome domestic interest group opposition. The absence of this second condition explains why EU influence in Ukraine has been weak in comparison with Bulgaria and Serbia. In this sector, however, ineffectiveness may be the result of more than simple reluctance of the EU to provide a membership incentive and active monitoring. As Adam Stulberg and Sandra Lavenex point out, the policy field of energy “constitutes a rare set of issues of rough parity between Brussels and ENP partners” with mutual vulnerabilities and complementary interests (Stulberg and Lavenex 2007: 137) so that the EU would not have the bargaining power to impose its energy policy rules on ENP countries unilaterally.

EU bargaining power is also highlighted as a crucial condition of effective rule transfer in two other studies. Esther Barbé, Oriol Costa, Anna Herrantz and Michal Natorki (Barbé et al. 2009) ask whose rules the EU and selected neighboring countries (Georgia, Morocco, Russia and Ukraine) choose for negotiations on foreign and security policy cooperation. They show that EU rules are by no means the focal point of cooperation and are no more prominent than other international rules or bilaterally negotiated new rules. Only those countries that harbor hopes of eventual accession are, on the whole, willing to adopt EU rules. This is why they perceive EU rules as legitimate. Otherwise, third countries will only orient themselves to EU rules if interdependence with the EU and EU bargaining power are high. Antoaneta Dimitrova and Rilka Dragneva (2009) emphasize the limits on the Europeanization of Ukraine imposed by Russia. In a comparison of trade, energy and foreign policy relations, they show that the effectiveness of EU rule export increases with Ukrainian dependence on the EU instead of Russia.

In many respects the ENP can be considered the most likely context for Europeanization beyond the group of member, quasi-member and candidate countries of the EU. It is here that international interdependence with the EU and the EU's efforts to expand its acquis are stronger than in other regions of the world. Nevertheless, studies of the neighborhood policies overwhelmingly show that the ENP is inconsistent – both with regard to the expansion of the acquis rules and the use of conditionality – and is ineffective. Neighborhood countries appear to be willing to adopt EU rules only if they hope to be considered for full membership in the future and to the extent that the EU possesses superior bargaining power vis-à-vis partner countries and alternative governance providers such as Russia. Both conditions are the exception rather than the rule in the European Neighborhood.

Therefore, in their study of EU external governance in the area of internal security, Sandra Lavenex and Nicole Wichmann (2009) start with the assumption that socialization through “network governance”, rather than hierarchical policy transfer through conditionality, is more likely to be used and effective in EU-neighborhood relations. Though they find abundant evidence of the existence of such transgovernmental networks, they also come to the conclusion that the operation and effectiveness of these networks is hampered by incompatible administrative structures, cultures, expertise and lack of trust.

The findings on the ENP apply a fortiori to the Russian district of Kaliningrad, which has also recently been analyzed from a Europeanization perspective (Gänzle, Müntel, and Vinokurov 2008). Although relations between the EU and Kaliningrad are not formally part of the ENP, as an exclave surrounded by EU territory, Kaliningrad was designed to be a “pilot region” for enhanced EU-Russia relations. In spite of this particular geographic situation and the interdependence that comes with it, Europeanization has remained very weak and selective (Gänzle and Münter 2008). Generally, the low level of regional autonomy, and Russia's insistence on safeguarding sovereignty and being treated as a special partner (Meloni 2008), limit the impact of EU rules. But “weak institutional capabilities and lack of interest” prevent Europeanization even in policy areas with comparatively high regional autonomy (Gänzle and Münter 2008: 251).

7 Conclusions

In the introductory sections of the review, I proposed to use the literature on Europeanization in candidate states for membership as a benchmark for the analysis of “Europeanization beyond Europe”. In general, the findings reported here suggest that the dividing line between candidate states and other third countries also constitutes a categorical difference for the analysis of the effects of Europeanization.

First, though the acquis communautaire is at the core of Europeanization in the case of “quasi-members” and candidate countries, the goals and contents of Europeanization beyond Europe – at least those analyzed in the majority of the literature – are of a more general character. “Regionalism” may still count as an EU-specific goal, which, if effectively pursued, would result in a distinctive “Europeanization” beyond Europe, other core goals such as stability and security or democracy and human rights are clearly less related to the EU's acquis and less specific to the EU's external relations. However, there is a clear tendency in more recent literature on the ENP to redress the balance in favor of the whole range of EU policies.

Second, even though positive political conditionality became a general feature of EU relations with third countries in the 1990s, it has been used less consistently than in EU relations with potential member states. Moreover, other instruments for promoting EU core values and norms – such as domestic empowerment of civil society or socialization through transgovernmental co-operation – do not appear to have been consistent and effective substitutes for political accession conditionality, even if they were described as unique EU strategies.

Third, the Europeanizing impact of these strategies has been weak beyond the group of credible candidates for EU membership. The causes for weak impact are probably manifold: low incentives and low consistency of policy on the part of the EU, and serious domestic obstacles to Europeanization on the part of third countries. In sum, membership, or the prospect or hope of membership, appears to be a crucial condition of Europeanization. With regard to its specific normative and regulatory content and its instruments and its impact, Europeanization beyond Europe is substantially weaker than Europeanization in Europe. This, however, need not be the last word on the issue.

1) The literature conveys the picture that Europeanization efforts beyond Europe are inconsistent and ineffective overall, but this does not mean that there are no cases of consistent policy and effective impact. Searching for such cases and studying their conditions in comparison with similar cases may generate better knowledge of the differential effects and the conditions of Europeanization in non-candidate countries. In general, we need further carefully designed and theory-guided comparative studies that directly address and assess the causality question between EU policies and domestic change.

2) Though most Europeanization literature focuses very much on policies, policy-making processes and administrative structures, the literature reviewed here was mainly about polity: regional integration and constitutional structure. Studies mirroring the general focus on policy and politics related to policy-making might well find a stronger impact of “Europe” on third countries. The few studies on the impact of EU external governance in the European Neighborhood mentioned above confirm this expectation. Even though it is far from the common and systematic impact of accession negotiations on candidate countries, the ENP does produce selective rule export – above all where EU bargaining power is high and third countries harbor hopes of being considered for accession in the future. More work of this kind is needed.

8 Acknowledgements

For their comments on the first version, I am grateful to Sandra Lavenex, Andrea Lenschow, the two anonymous reviewers, and the audience at the 2006 Istanbul conference of the ECPR Standing Group on European Politics for helpful comments on previous versions of this review. I also thank Gerda Falkner and Patrick Scherhauser for their advice and patience.

References

- Alecu de Flers, Nicole, Regelsberger, Elfriede, 2005, “The EU and Inter-regional Cooperation”, in International Relations and the European Union, (Eds.) Hill, Christopher, Smith, Michael, pp. 317–342, Oxford University Press, Oxford. (Cited on page 13.)
- Allen, David, Smith, Michael, 1990, “Western Europe’s Presence in the Contemporary International Arena”, Review of International Studies, 16(1): 19–39, doi:10.1017/S0260210500112628. (Cited on page 8.)
- Baracani, Elena, 2009, “The European Neighbourhood Policy and Political Conditionality: Double Standards in EU Democracy Promotion?”, in The External Dimension of EU Justice and Home Affairs. Governance, Neighbours, Security, (Ed.) Balzacq, T., pp. 133–153, Palgrave Macmillan, Basingstoke. (Cited on pages 17 and 18.)
- Barbé, Esther, Costa, Oriol, Herranz Surrallés, Anna, Natorski, Michal, 2009, “Which Rules Shape EU’s External Governance? The Pattern of Rule Selection in Foreign and Security Policies”, Journal of European Public Policy, 16(6): 834–852, doi:10.1080/13501760903087845. (Cited on page 19.)
- Bauer, Michael, Knill, Christoph, Pitschel, Diana, 2007, “Differential Europeanisation in Eastern Europe: The Impact of Diverse EU Regulatory Governance Patterns”, Journal of European Integration, 29(4): 405–423, doi:10.1080/07036330701502431. (Cited on pages 7 and 9.)
- Bicchi, Federica, 2006, “‘Our size fits all’: Normative Power Europe and the Mediterranean”, Journal of European Public Policy, 13(2): 286–303, doi:10.1080/13501760500451733. (Cited on pages 10, 13, and 15.)
- Börzel, Tanja A., Risse, Thomas, 2004, “One Size Fits All! EU Policies for the Promotion of Human Rights, Democracy and the Rule of Law”, Workshop on Democracy Promotion, Center for Development, Democracy, and the Rule of Law, Stanford University, 4–5 October, conference paper. Related online version (cited on 25 May 2007): http://www.atasp.de/downloads/tandt_stanford_final.pdf. (Cited on page 15.)
- Bosse, Giselle, 2007, “Values in the EU’s Neighbourhood Policy: Political Rhetoric of Reflection of a Coherent Policy?”, European Political Economy Review, 2007(7): 38–62. URL (cited on 4 December 2009): <http://www.ugbs.org/weru/eper/no7/bosse.pdf>. (Cited on page 18.)
- Bulmer, Simon, 2007, “Theorizing Europeanization”, in Europeanization: New Research Agendas, (Eds.) Graziano, Paolo, Vink, Maarten P., pp. 46–58, Palgrave Macmillan, Basingstoke. (Cited on page 6.)
- Christiansen, Thomas, Petto, Fabio, Tonra, Ben, 2000, “Fuzzy Politics Around Fuzzy Borders: The European Union’s ‘Near Abroad’”, Cooperation and Conflict, 35(4): 389–415, doi:10.1177/00108360021962183. (Cited on page 14.)
- Coppieters, Bruno, Emerson, Michael, Huyseune, Michel, Kovziridze, Tamara, Noutcheva, Gergana, Tocci, Nathalie, Vahl, Marius, 2004, Europeanization and Conflict Resolution: Case Studies from the European Periphery, vol. 1/2004 of Journal on Ethnopolitics and Minority Issues in Europe (Special Focus), Academia Press, Ghent. Google Books. Related online version (cited on 5 June 2007): http://ecmi.de/jemie/special_1_2004.html. (Cited on page 8.)

- Crawford, Gordon, 2005, “The European Union and Democracy Promotion in Africa: The Case of Ghana”, European Journal of Development Research, 17(4): 571–600, doi: 10.1080/09578810500367516. (Cited on pages 10 and 16.)
- Diez, Thomas, Stetter, Stephan, Albert, Mathias, 2006, “The European Union and Border Conflicts: The Transformative Power of Integration”, International Organization, 60(3): 563–593, doi: 10.1017/S0020818306060218. (Cited on pages 7, 8, 9, and 14.)
- Dimitrova, Antoaneta, Dragneva, Rilka, 2009, “Constraining External Governance: Interdependence with Russia and the CIS as Limits to EU’s Rule Transfer in Ukraine”, Journal of European Public Policy, 16(6): 853–872, doi: 10.1080/13501760903087894. (Cited on page 19.)
- Farrell, Mary, 2007, “From EU Model to External Policy? Promoting Regional Integration in the Rest of the World”, in Making History: European Integration and Institutional Change at Fifty, (Eds.) Meunier, Sophie, McNamara, Kathleen R., vol. 8 of The State of the European Union, pp. 299–315, Oxford University Press, Oxford. Google Books. (Cited on pages 10, 11, and 14.)
- Fischer, Alex, Nicolet, Sarah, Sciarini, Pascal, 2002, “Europeanisation of a Non-European Country: The Case of Swiss Immigration Policy”, West European Politics, 25(4): 143–170, doi: 10.1080/713601646. (Cited on page 5.)
- Freyburg, Tina, Skripka, Tatiana, Wetzel, Anne, 2007, “Democracy Between the Lines? EU Promotion of Democratic Governance via Sector-Specific Cooperation”, Challenges to Democracy in the 21st Century, No. 5, National Centre of Competence in Research, Zurich. URL (cited on 4 December 2009): <http://www.nccr-democracy.uzh.ch/publications/workingpaper/pdf/WP5.pdf>. (Cited on page 19.)
- Freyburg, Tina, Lavenex, Sandra, Schimmelfennig, Frank, Scholtz, Hanno, Skripka, Tatiana, Wetzel, Anne, 2009a, “Neue Wege der externen Demokratieförderung: Demokratisches Regieren in der Europäischen Nachbarschaftspolitik”, in Externe Faktoren der Demokratisierung, (Eds.) Erdmann, Gero, Kneuer, Marianne, pp. 169–193, Nomos, Baden-Baden. (Cited on page 19.)
- Freyburg, Tina, Lavenex, Sandra, Schimmelfennig, Frank, Skripka, Tatiana, Wetzel, Anne, 2009b, “EU Promotion of Democratic Governance in the Neighborhood”, Journal of European Public Policy, 16(6): 916–934, doi: 10.1080/13501760903088405. (Cited on page 19.)
- Gänzle, Stefan, Münter, Guido, 2008, “Summary: Kaliningrad and Europeanisation á la carte”, in Adapting to European Integration? Kaliningrad, Russia and the European Union, (Eds.) Gänzle, Stefan, Müntel, Guido, Vinokurov, Evgeny, pp. 249–254, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on page 20.)
- Gänzle, Stefan, Müntel, Guido, Vinokurov, Evgeny (Eds.), 2008, Adapting to European Integration? Kaliningrad, Russia and the European Union, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on page 20.)
- Gillespie, Richard, Whitehead, Laurence, 2002, “European Democracy Promotion in North Africa: Limits and Prospects”, Democratization, 9(1): 192–206, doi: 10.1080/714000242. (Cited on page 18.)
- Gillespie, Richard, Youngs, Richard, 2002, “Themes in European Democracy Promotion”, Democratization, 9(1): 1–16, doi: 10.1080/714000235. (Cited on page 18.)

- Goetz, Klaus H., Meyer-Sahling, Jan-Hinrik, 2008, “The Europeanisation of national political systems: Parliaments and executives”, Living Reviews in European Governance, 3(2), lreg-2008-2. URL (cited on 4 December 2009): <http://www.livingreviews.org/lreg-2008-2>. (Cited on page 5.)
- Grugel, Jean B., 2004, “New Regionalism and Modes of Governance – Comparing US and EU Strategies in Latin America”, European Journal of International Relations, 10(4): 603–626, doi:10.1177/1354066104047850. (Cited on pages 10, 12, and 13.)
- Haddadi, Said, 2002, “Two Cheers for Whom? The EU and Democratization in Morocco”, Democratization, 9(1): 149–169, doi:10.1080/714000238. (Cited on page 18.)
- Haddadi, Said, 2003, “The EMP and Morocco: Diverging Political Agendas?”, Mediterranean Politics, 8(2): 73–169, doi:10.1080/13629390308230006. (Cited on page 18.)
- Hazelzet, Hadewych, 2005, “Suspension of Development Cooperation: An Instrument to Promote Human Rights and Democracy?”, ECDPM Discussion Paper, 64B, European Centre for Development Policy Management, Maastricht. URL (cited on 14 January 2007): <http://www.ecdpm.org/dp64B>. (Cited on page 16.)
- Hill, Christopher, Smith, Michael, 2005, “Acting for Europe: Reassessing the European Union’s Place in International Relations”, in International Relations and the European Union, (Eds.) Hill, Christopher, Smith, Michael, pp. 388–406, Oxford, Oxford University Press. (Cited on page 14.)
- Hofer, Stephan, 2008, Die Europäische Union als Regelexporteur: Die Europäisierung der Energiepolitik in Bulgarien, Serbien und der Ukraine, Nomos, Baden-Baden. (Cited on page 19.)
- Holland, Martin, 2002, The European Union and the Third World, Palgrave, Basingstoke. (Cited on pages 12, 15, and 16.)
- Hornig, Der-Chin, 2003, “The Human Rights Clause in the European Union’s External Trade and Development Agreements”, European Law Journal, 9(5): 677–701, doi:10.1046/j.1468-0386.2003.00198.x. (Cited on page 12.)
- Hurt, Stephen R., 2003, “Co-operation and coercion? The Cotonou Agreement Between the European Union and ACP States and the End of the Lomé Convention”, Third World Quarterly, 24(1): 161–176, doi:10.1080/713701373. (Cited on pages 10 and 14.)
- Hurt, Stephen R., 2004, “The European Union’s External Relations with Africa After the Cold War”, in Africa in International Politics: External Involvement on the Continent, (Eds.) Taylor, Ian, Williams, Paul, pp. 155–173, Routledge, London. Google Books. (Cited on pages 10 and 11.)
- Joffé, George Howard, 2001, “European Union and the Mediterranean”, in European Union and New Regionalism, (Ed.) Telo, Mario, pp. 207–225, Ashgate, Aldershot. (Cited on page 13.)
- Johansson-Nogués, Elisabeth, 2007, “The EU and Its Neighbourhood: an Overview”, in Governing Europe’s Neighbourhood, (Eds.) Weber, Katja, Smith, Michael E., Baun, Michael, pp. 21–35, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on page 17.)
- Jünemann, Annette, 2002, “From the Bottom to the Top: Civil Society and Transnational Non-Governmental Organizations in the Euro-Mediterranean Partnership”, Democratization, 9(1): 87–105, doi:10.1080/714000236. (Cited on page 18.)
- Jünemann, Annette, 2003, “Security-Building in the Mediterranean After September 11”, Mediterranean Politics, 8(2): 1–20, doi:10.1080/13629390308230002. (Cited on page 18.)

- Kelley, Judith G., 2004, Ethnic Politics in Europe: The Power of Norms and Incentives, Princeton University Press, Princeton. Google Books. (Cited on page 8.)
- Kelley, Judith G., 2006, “New Wine in Old Wine Skins: Policy Adaptation in the European Neighbourhood Policy”, Journal of Common Market Studies, 44(1): 29–55, doi:10.1111/j.1468-5965.2006.00613.x. (Cited on page 17.)
- Knill, Christoph, Lenschow, Andrea, 2005, “Compliance, Competition and Communication: Different Approaches of European Governance and their Impact on National Institutions”, Journal of Common Market Studies, 43(3): 583–604, doi:10.1111/j.0021-9886.2005.00570.x. (Cited on page 7.)
- Kubicek, Paul J. (Ed.), 2003, The European Union and Democratization, Routledge, London. Google Books. (Cited on page 8.)
- Ladrech, Robert, 2009, “Europeanization and political parties”, Living Reviews in European Governance, 4(1), lreg-2009-1. URL (cited on 4 December 2009): <http://www.livingreviews.org/lreg-2009-1>. (Cited on page 5.)
- Læg Reid, Per, Steinhörsson, Runolfur Smari, Thorhallsson, Baldur, 2004, “Europeanization of Central Government Administration in the Nordic States”, Journal of Common Market Studies, 42(2): 347–369, doi:10.1111/j.1468-5965.2004.00491.x. (Cited on page 5.)
- Lavenex, Sandra, 2004, “EU External Governance in ‘Wider Europe’”, Journal of European Public Policy, 11(4): 680–700, doi:10.1080/1350176042000248098. (Cited on page 10.)
- Lavenex, Sandra, Uçarar, Emek M., 2004, “The External Dimension of Europeanization: The Case of Immigration Policies”, Cooperation and Conflict, 39(4): 417–443, doi:10.1177/0010836704047582. (Cited on pages 7 and 9.)
- Lavenex, Sandra, Wichmann, Nicole, 2009, “The External Governance of EU Internal Security”, Journal of European Integration, 33(1): 83–102, doi:10.1080/07036330802503932. (Cited on page 20.)
- Lucarelli, Sonia, Manners, Ian, 2006, Values and Principles in European Foreign Policy, Routledge, London. (Cited on page 10.)
- Mach, André, Häusermann, Silja, Papadopoulos, Yannis, 2003, “Economic Regulatory Reforms in Switzerland: Adjustment without European Integration, Or How Rigidities Become Flexible”, Journal of European Public Policy, 10(2): 301–318, doi:10.1080/1350176032000059053. (Cited on page 5.)
- Magen, Amichai, 2007, “The Acquis Communautaire as an Instrument of EU External Influence”, European Journal of Law Reform, 9(3): 361–392. (Cited on page 11.)
- Maier, Sylvia, Schimmelfennig, Frank, 2007, “Shared Values: Democracy and Human Rights”, in Governing Europe’s Neighbourhood, (Eds.) Weber, Katja, Smith, Michael E., Baun, Michael, pp. 39–57, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on pages 17 and 18.)
- Manners, Ian, 2002, “Normative Power Europe: a Contradiction in Terms?”, Journal of Common Market Studies, 40(2): 235–258, doi:10.1111/1468-5965.00353. (Cited on pages 10 and 11.)
- March, James G., Olsen, Johan P., 1989, Rediscovering Institutions: The Organizational Basis of Politics, Free Press, New York. (Cited on page 7.)

- Meloni, Gabriella, 2008, “Russia: a Case for Revisiting the Concept of Europeanisation”, in Adapting to European Integration? Kaliningrad, Russia and the European Union, (Eds.) Gänzle, Stefan, Müntel, Guido, Vinokurov, Evgeny, pp. 39–57, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on page 20.)
- Myrjord, Anne, 2003, “Governance Beyond the Union: EU Boundaries in the Barents Euro-Arctic Region”, European Foreign Affairs Review, 8(2): 239–257. (Cited on page 14.)
- Noutcheva, Gergana, Emerson, Michael, 2007, “Economic and Social Development”, in Governing Europe’s Neighbourhood, (Eds.) Weber, Katja, Smith, Michael E., Baun, Michael, pp. 76–96, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on pages 17 and 19.)
- Nwobike, Justice, 2005, “The Application of Human Rights in African Caribbean and Pacific–European Union Development and Trade Partnership”, German Law Journal, 6(10): 1381–1406. URL (cited on 27 June 2007): <http://www.germanlawjournal.com/article.php?id=640>. (Cited on page 12.)
- Occhipinti, John D., 2007, “Justice and Home Affairs: Immigration and Policing”, in Governing Europe’s Neighbourhood, (Eds.) Weber, Katja, Smith, Michael E., Baun, Michael, pp. 114–133, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on page 17.)
- Pace, Michelle, 2009, “Paradoxes and Contradictions in EU Democracy Promotion in the Mediterranean: the Limits of Normative Power”, Democratization, 16(1): 39–58, doi: 10.1080/13510340802575809. (Cited on page 18.)
- Pace, Michelle, Seeberg, Peter, Cavatorta, Francesco, 2009, “The EU’s Democratization Agenda in the Mediterranean: a Critical Inside-Out Approach”, Democratization, 16(1): 3–19, doi: 10.1080/13510340802575783. (Cited on page 18.)
- Peters, Dirk, Wagner, Wolfgang, 2005, “Die Europäische Union in den internationalen Beziehungen”, in Die Europäische Union: Theorien und Analysekonzepte, (Eds.) Holzinger, Katharina, Knill, Christoph, Peters, Dirk, Rittberger, Berthold, Schimmelfennig, Frank, Wagner, Wolfgang, pp. 215–272, Schöningh, Paderborn. (Cited on pages 10 and 11.)
- Sasse, Gwendolyn, 2008, “The European Neighbourhood Policy: Conditionality Revisited for the EU’s Eastern Neighbours”, Europe-Asia Studies, 60(2): 295–316, doi: 10.1080/09668130701820150. (Cited on page 18.)
- Schimmelfennig, Frank, 2003, The EU, NATO and the Integration of Europe: Rules and Rhetoric, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge. Google Books. (Cited on page 16.)
- Schimmelfennig, Frank, 2005, “The EU: Promoting Liberal Democracy through Membership Conditionality”, in Socializing Democratic Norms: The Role of International Organizations for the Construction of Europe, (Ed.) Flockhart, Trine, pp. 106–126, Palgrave Macmillan, Basingstoke. (Cited on page 12.)
- Schimmelfennig, Frank, Sedelmeier, Ulrich, 2004, “Governance by Conditionality: EU Rule Transfer to the Candidate Countries of Central and Eastern Europe”, Journal of European Public Policy, 11(4): 661–679, doi:10.1080/1350176042000248089. (Cited on page 7.)
- Schimmelfennig, Frank, Sedelmeier, Ulrich, 2005a, “Introduction: Conceptualizing the Europeanization of Central and Eastern Europe”, in The Europeanization of Central and Eastern Europe, (Eds.) Schimmelfennig, Frank, Sedelmeier, Ulrich, pp. 1–28, Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY. Google Books. (Cited on pages 7 and 9.)

- Schimmelfennig, Frank, Sedelmeier, Ulrich (Eds.), 2005b, The Europeanization of Central and Eastern Europe, Cornell University Press, Ithaca, NY. (Cited on pages 9 and 10.)
- Schimmelfennig, Frank, Engert, Stefan, Knobel, Heiko, 2006, International Socialization in Europe: European Organizations, Political Conditionality, and Democratic Change, Palgrave Macmillan, Basingstoke. (Cited on page 16.)
- Sciarini, Pascal, Fischer, Alex, Nicolet, Sarah, 2004, “How Europe Hits Home: Evidence From the Swiss Case”, Journal of European Public Policy, 11(3): 353–378, doi:10.1080/13501760410001694228. (Cited on page 5.)
- Sedelmeier, Ulrich, 2006, “Europeanisation in new member and candidate states”, Living Reviews in European Governance, 1(3), lreg-2006-3. URL (cited on 15 April 2007): <http://www.livingreviews.org/lreg-2006-3>. (Cited on page 5.)
- Sedelmeier, Ulrich, 2007, “The European Neighbourhood Policy: a Comment on Theory and Policy”, in Governing Europe’s Neighbourhood, (Eds.) Weber, Katja, Smith, Michael E., Baun, Michael, pp. 195–208, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on pages 17 and 18.)
- Sjursen, Helene, 2006a, “What kind of power?”, Journal of European Public Policy, 13(2): 169–181, doi:10.1080/13501760500451584. (Cited on page 10.)
- Sjursen, Helene, 2006b, “The EU as a ‘Normative’ Power: How Can This Be?”, Journal of European Public Policy, 13(2): 235–251, doi:10.1080/13501760500451667. (Cited on page 10.)
- Smith, Karen E., 2001, “The EU, Human Rights and Relations with Third Countries: ‘Foreign Policy’ with an Ethical Dimension?”, in Ethics and Foreign Policy, (Eds.) Smith, Karen E., Light, Margot, pp. 185–203, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge. Google Books. (Cited on pages 12, 15, and 16.)
- Stulberg, Adam N., Lavenex, Sandra, 2007, “Connecting the Neighbourhood: Energy and Environment”, in Governing Europe’s Neighbourhood, (Eds.) Weber, Katja, Smith, Michael E., Baun, Michael, pp. 134–155, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on page 19.)
- Sverdrup, Ulf, Kux, Stephan, 2000, “Fuzzy Borders and Adaptive Outsiders: Norway, Switzerland, and the EU”, Journal of European Integration, 22(3): 237–270. (Cited on page 5.)
- Tanner, Fred, 2004, “North Africa: Partnership, Exceptionalism and Neglect”, in European Union Foreign and Security Policy: Towards a Neighbourhood Strategy, (Ed.) Dannreuther, Roland, pp. 135–150, Routledge, London. Google Books. (Cited on page 17.)
- Treib, Oliver, 2008, “Implementing and complying with EU governance outputs”, Living Reviews in European Governance, 3(5), lreg-2008-5. URL (cited on 4 December 2009): <http://www.livingreviews.org/lreg-2008-5>. (Cited on page 5.)
- Vachudová, Milada Anna, 2005, Europe Undivided: Democracy, Leverage, and Integration Since 1989, Oxford University Press, Oxford. (Cited on page 16.)
- Vachudová, Milada Anna, 2007, “Trade and the Internal Market”, in Governing Europe’s Neighbourhood, (Eds.) Weber, Katja, Smith, Michael E., Baun, Michael, pp. 97–113, Manchester University Press, Manchester. (Cited on page 17.)
- Vink, Maarten P., Graziano, Paolo, 2007, “Challenges of a New Research Agenda”, in Europeanization: New Research Agendas, (Eds.) Graziano, Paolo, Vink, Maarten P., pp. 3–20, Palgrave Macmillan, Basingstoke. (Cited on page 5.)

- Warkotsch, Alexander, 2006, “The European Union and Democracy Promotion in Bad Neighbourhoods: The Case of Central Asia”, European Foreign Affairs Review, 11(4): 509–525. (Cited on pages 15 and 16.)
- Warkotsch, Alexander, 2008, “Non-compliance and Instrumental Variation in EU Democracy Promotion”, Journal of European Public Policy, 15(2): 227–245, doi:10.1080/13501760701817732. (Cited on page 15.)
- Woolcock, Stephen, 2005, “Trade Policy”, in Policy-Making in the European Union, (Eds.) Wallace, Helen, Wallace, William, Pollack, Mark A., pp. 377–399, Oxford University Press, Oxford. (Cited on page 10.)
- Youngs, Richard, 2001a, The European Union and the Promotion of Democracy: Europe’s Mediterranean and Asian Policies, Oxford University Press, Oxford. (Cited on pages 12, 16, and 17.)
- Youngs, Richard, 2001b, “European Union Democracy Promotion Policies: Ten Years On”, European Foreign Affairs Review, 6(3): 355–373, doi:10.1023/A:1012424101504. (Cited on pages 12, 15, and 16.)
- Youngs, Richard, 2002, “The European Union and Democracy Promotion in the Mediterranean: A New or Disingenuous Strategy?”, Democratization, 9(1): 40–62, doi:10.1080/714000237. (Cited on page 18.)
- Youngs, Richard, 2004, “Normative Dynamics and Strategic Interests in the EU’s External Identity”, Journal of Common Market Studies, 42(2): 415–435, doi:10.1111/j.1468-5965.2004.00494.x. (Cited on page 16.)
- Youngs, Richard (Ed.), 2008, Is the European Union Supporting Democracy in its Neighbourhood?, FRIDE, Madrid. Related online version (cited on 4 December 2009): <http://www.fride.org/download/librofride.pdf>. (Cited on page 18.)